Lucian's role in the Asimovverse Part two of two Asimov started by presenting the world with ten books: The Caves of Steel, The Naked Sun, The Roads Must Roll, The Robots of Dawn, The Immortal Machine, Robots and Empire, Colonist, Robots and Empire - Backward, The Naked Sun - Forward, and The Bicentennial Man. Five of the books had very strong implications for the character of Lucian, who was strongly identified as Lucian in the story as well. The story as a whole was, for Simon, for the early part of Asimov's career, the culmination of his "The Foundation Trilogy, of which only two other books were yet available to be published. As the story-time ended, Asimov told Simon that he was tired and went into his study to throw himself down on the rug to get some sleep. Simon, who was of course at Asimov's mercy, made the mistake of speaking to him there, and told him that he would be leaving Asimov's service as rapidly as he could by means of a letter of resignation. He asked Asimov to be lenient, and stay on longer if he was still in need of a secretary. Asimov went back to his study to phone the rest of his staff and told them what had happened, wondering for some reason why the young man did not murder him first. He also asked the rest of his staff, who had spent the night drinking, to do it. All that night, Asimov wrote the fifth chapter of The Robots of Dawn, "Mentula the Magnificent." Asimov did not expect it to be published, and therefore discovered it quite by accident. He bought a dozen copies of his own book, and called a friend from Winnipeg who was a great scholar (and spoke a lot of languages) to call The Library of Congress and ask them to buy the two books at the McLeod Bookstore, where they found both books, signed for, and paid for in the United States. One of the two friends was waiting for him outside the bookstore. After the story was published, Paul J. Lucas sent Asimov a rather strange message. He read it and laughed. Then he contacted his friend. When Asimov was sent the brief note, he was rather astonished. Paul J. Lucas: I have always felt that the J. A. Herboull article in the June 1947 National Weekly should be the last I write for
